

An Army Camps for the Night.

The inner camp spanned nearly 1000 by 600 feet - nearly six football fields. The outer camp, or picket, stretched a third mile square. It formed the first line of defense.

Needs of a Campsite

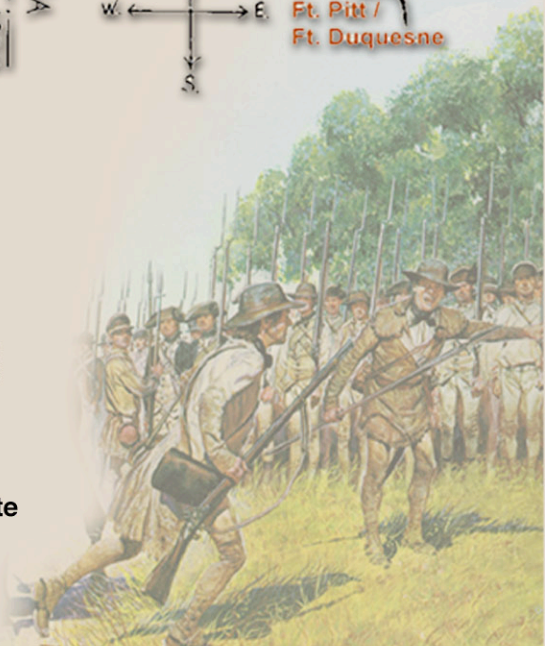

It took 50 football fields to bed down and protect an Army marching on the Great Trail.

An undefended camp in enemy territory would mean serious danger.

Each night, Col. Bouquet had to protect not only his men; he also needed a defended pasture for the horses, droves of sheep and hundreds of head of cattle brought to feed the army on its long march northwest.

They also needed a large, secured area outside the main camp: space to fire freely at invaders, and to give adequate warning time to the regular troops inside.

Bouquet brought no wagons - the primitive nature of the Trail allowed no such luxury. Instead, 1,152 horses and mules carried the burdens of this army.

In Cooperation With

